Arterial collaterals have been studied in 87 patients with distal venous obstructive lesions, and in 69 patients in occlusive arterial lesions. Only 32.6% of the patients had collaterals in the femoro-popliteal axis. It was more frequent (56.6%) in the obturator axis, which is an indication that collateralization and the steal phenomenon depend on the site and complexity of the vascular lesion. Pathological thrill of the great artery, obliteration of the first web of the great vessels and the anastomotic network on the medial side of the popliteal fossa were found in most patients with obstruction of the femoral axis. The patency of the popliteal axis was only observed in patients with severe obstruction. These collaterals only reached 18.4% of the patients with arterial obstruction of the lower limbs.A spinning worm gear is a gear driven by a worm engaging a gear train. The worm has a length which is much longer than the distance between the worm's helix and where the helix engages the gear train. This invention is adapted to create a worm drive connecting an engine to a device such as a pump or compressor. It is known to connect a hydraulic pump to the high speed end of a worm drive. The pump is hydraulically coupled to a hydraulic motor. The worm drive produces high side load and thus puts a high torque load on the worm. In addition, the hydraulic pump must be connected to the high speed side of the drive, and this is rather difficult to accomplish. It is also known to use a motor to drive a compressor or pump. These motors are typically either a direct drive or an epicyclic motor. The direct drive motor has low efficiency and thus the power produced is limited. The epicyclic motor can be much more efficient but it is impractical to use an epicyclic motor to drive the worm gear. It is also known to use a three-speed gear train to drive a worm gear. However, this involves the use of three gear trains and a flexible connection between each gear

But this was just a friendly neighborhood idea that has turned into a movement." With a simple message, a group of Madison residents had a giant banner hanging above them asking donors to support a Democratic candidate. But they didn't have a single person asking for money. They just wanted to get information. "I have friends that are Republicans and Democrats but I'm not particularly political and I just thought it would be a good idea to have a little conversation," said Madison resident Patty Milkey. To most in Madison, a cash mob is synonymous with voter registration. But this was a different idea. "This idea was basically an educational, nonpartisan thing," said Bob Hill who helped lead the gathering. The campaign gathered mostly from the Madison community, yet also took volunteers from Huntsville and Tuscaloosa. "It was just a local idea,
